Adence before the race was a trial the English had. Duncan, the best of the riers. They have some good men, but riers. They have some good men, but Duncan went out of sight ahead of the bunch between eight and nine miles. As soon as I heard that I felt sure we had them. Duncan's pace was too fart for a man training for a Marathon. I knew he'd try the same pace in the big race, and I knew that no living man could stick it out and finish well going like that. So we kept plugging on with our work.

I was never in better condition. I wasn't even tired.

"As we neared the Stadium the crowds grew thicker and thicker. The last mile was through a sort of meadow, and here the English jummed in close to the course, leaving just room enough for our elbows to swing without hitting on either side. There vere stacks of police detailed to keep file road clear.

"No-not a sign of trouble anywhere along the line. There was just one solid roar of cheering. Of course they were cheering just as lard an age."

"We studied all the conditions in England. We did our training very carefully and lost no sleep over the stories about the terrible pace the English distance runners would cut out. Mike Murphy was with us, and we knew we had the best advice, anyway. There's a man who is entitled to a lot of credit, Mike ought to have the biggest loving cup that there is in the market, and they ought to put him in the Hall of Fame. He surely did a lot for us over there.

"I kept looking ahead and wondering why the other wo dian't come back to me. I was running strong and increasing the face with every mile, and I knew the others must be failing. Yet I ran and ran without getting a sight of anyhing but waving arms and flags and surging crowds that closed in ahead of me and then opened as I came to give me a fair lane. Those other two fellows were surely game. I heard afterward that after Dorando made his great effort outside a mile a so and got by Hefteron he began falling down and stagegring on again when they helped him up. Talk about gameness. What I did was nothing to that, for I didn't feel distressed at all. It didn't feel distressed at all.

BY VINCENT TREANOR. District-attorney winslow, of Westchester County, is going Empire City track on warrants. These or this, and I was going at a mile run clip now without wracking.

"At last I got Hefferon. The poor fellow was staggering. His legs were pumping up and down mechanically but he was hardly getting out of his own tracks. I didn't turn my head as I went by at full speed, but I saw that he was too far in to make any effort to tail on to the procession. Too bad, too, for it was orly about a hundred and twenty-five yards outside the Stadium gates.

Mansfield to Fight O'Rourke.

A match has been arranged between Harry Mansheld, the rugged English fighter, and Joe O'Rourke, the bout to take place in the near future before one of the local clubs. Forfeits have been posted by both sides, and the managers of the two scrappers will get together to-night to talk over the amount of the side bet. Mansheld has been fighting around New York for some time and has a good record, while O'Rourke is a youngster of whom great things are expected.
